The long awaited LIBE Committee’s report on the Data Protection Regulation has now been made available, flabbergasting experts with its even stricter and tougher to implement proposals.

“What was already a very complex piece of draft legislation has become by far the strictest, most wide ranging and potentially most difficult to navigate data protection law ever to be proposed,” commented Eduardo Ustaran, Partner at Field Fisher Waterhouse.

Amongst the wide ranging and far reaching recommendations, the LIBE Committee has proposed expanding the obligation for organisations to appoint Data Protection Officers. Under the draft Regulation, the appointment of one or more DPOs is required for all public bodies, as well as enterprises (private sector) with more than 250 employees, or those whose core activities involve regular and systematic monitoring of data subjects. The Committee now says that the obligation for mandatory DPOs should kick in for enterprises that (whatever their size) process personal data relating to 500 or more individuals per year.

“This will significantly increase the number of enterprises that will need to engage a DPO when the new law comes into force. Very small companies that process data on large numbers of customers will be included,” commented Peter Carey, Head of the Examination Board for the Practitioner Certificate in Data Protection.

Other measures introduced in the draft Regulation that have

(Continued on page 18)